Kingdon of the First Congregational church in the living room at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Draland, 241 Plover street, at 11 o'clock Christmas morning. WE, the WOMEN BY RUTH MILLETT

Every time a kid who has managed to stretch his age and enlist in one of the services is found out and shipped home to his family, attention is focused on one of the big problems that parents of 15, 16 and 17-year-old boys face today.

Seeing the older boys go off to war and knowing that, if the war lasts very long, they will be in it themselves makes many younger boys restless, bored with their school work, annoyed at being treated like children.

The ones who get to feeling that way stay away from school or dream through classes, rebel at home authority, and wait impatiently for the day when they will be old enough to put on a uniform.

It is beginning to look as if the one thing that could be done to prevent boys from wasting the precious years that are left to them is to dramatize for them the part that education plays in modern warfare.

If these kids could be shown how what they are learning today will contribute directly to what kind of a soldier they are tomorrow, school would take on more meaning.

Instead the answer most grown-ups give rebellious high school students is, "You had better take advantage of your opportunities. If you don't, you'll be sorry."

SHOW THEM THEIR JOB That is no answer calculated to appeal to a 15-year-old who is getting restless at having to sit in school all day when his big brother is in North Africa or Iceland. It is up to teachers and parents to show these high-spirited kids just why Uncle Sam would rather have them in school than in uniform.

If they can see a good reason for studying, one that is tied in with the war and their own future part in it, they'll get down to business and make the next year or two really count for something.
