Some war wives do considerable worrying over what their husbands will be like when they come home. They figure they are sure to change. And it occurs to them that the changes may not be to the good.

They wonder if their men may not come home, restless, unwilling to settle down, and so used to being bachelors that they will be bored by settled, married life. It never occurs to these women that their husbands may change for the better.

And yet many of the women themselves have improved and grown and learned through their enforced separation from their hus-

They have become more capable, more independent, and have had time to realize just how important their marriages are to them.

They have had time to sit and think through their marriages and to see where they made mistakes, through ignorance, through never having quite enough time to think opinions.

They have grown more conscious of their looks. After all, there is no longer anyone around to compliment them blindly or to say reassuringly, "You always look beautiful to me." Now they have to earn their praise and their admiration. So most of the war wives aren't
