I stopped suddenly as my eyes fell upon a small folded square of paper that lay upon the floor. It was the paper that had come out of Herman's pocket when he had drawn his big red handkerchief. I had been so anxious to stop his crying that I had forgotten about that paper when I ran to bring out his old fiddle-box. But now I picked it up. It was a single sheet, folded once, and I unfolded it and found upon it just one sentence. I read it slowly, and then I gave a low whistle as I looked up. (Continued tomorrow)
