The state building agency could handle the project but it was indicated that it would be to the financial advantage of the Center if the building were constructed and financed through some local arrangement.

It was pointed out that costs would be higher for a state project and that the Center would be required to make up amortization deficits each year. In the end, the building would belong to the state and not the community.

Heinen discussed the steps that must be taken to route the project through state agencies, but suggested "I don't think you want to take this step yet."

Alternatives, he said, include setting up a local non-profit corporation (city and county backing would still be necessary); having the city undertake the project; having St. Joseph's Hospital, which particularly needs the dormitory for its nursing students, build the dormitory, or seeking out "a local philanthropist to get the show on the road (there could be tax advantages)."

He suggested that a local self-amortizing project might be undertaken by limiting construction to a 50 or 60-bed unit, costing $150,000 to $175,000.

Koopman, exploring this line of reasoning, proposed that 35-bed units costing about $80,000 each could be built, with such units being added as the need arose and eliminating the possibility of overbuilding.
